Etym. dub. Two suggestions are forthcoming, (1) that of Diez, making the word cognate to Fanfarone, boaster, v. Fanfara, (2) that of Storm, who classes it with Fanfaluca, along with the dialectic forms Fanfulla (Milanese), Fánfola (Comascan), Fanfonj (Sicilian), meaning joke, < Gr. πομφόλυξ, bubble, through fanfólo*, fánfolo* (cp. Ségola, Ségale, < L. secāle), Fanfano (cp. Modano, < L. modulum). By a further change (with a parallel in Cécero, < Cecino, swan) Storm would obtain Fanfero, and perhaps Vanvera, either under attraction from vano or from simple change in pronunciation. He adduces the word Sfanfanare, q.v. in loco, in support of his hypothesis. But all this, as Körting says, is not very convincing, and Diez's assumption of an imitative base is decidedly preferable.

Flòtta f.; fleet. * = Frotta, troop.

Etym. Borrowed from Fr. flotte, a word first used in the sense of "fleet" in the 16th century. "Flote in old French like the corresponding Romance words, Span. flota, Portug. frota, Ital. fiotta, frotta, means multitude, < L. fluctus, wave, taken fig. for abundance, with change of gender (It. has also the masculine forms fiotto, frotto). The word for fleet in old French is not flotte, but estoire; the expression flotte de nefs, assemblage of ships, is like flotte de gens, assemblage of people. But the Germanic languages have a word for assemblage of ships, Dutch vloot, Swedish flotta, A.S. fliet, E. fleet. This last has furnished directly the word flete as appears above" (viz. in a quotation given from Du Cange, sub Avirunatus, Après avironna le suppliant et mena la flette du costé du port), "and it is certain, as Diez observes, that the Germanic words operated to give flotte, multitude, its present meaning of fleet" (Littré).

G

G m., sometimes f.; pronounced Gi. It interchanges with b (Beppe or Geppe, Cambiare or Cangiare), c (Lagrima or Lacrima, Federigo or Federico), d (Diaccio or Ghiaccio, Vedo or Veggo), z (Palazzo or Palagio, Prezzo or Pregio), and v (Parvolo or Pargolo); gh interchanges with gl (Mugghiare or Mugliare); sometimes it disappears (Gire or Ire, Sciagurato or Sciaurato). Abbreviations: G.B., Giambattista; G.C., Gesù Cristo, Giulio Cesare or Gran Croce d' un ordine cavalleresco; G.D., Giandomenico, Granduca or Granduchessa; G.F., Gianfrancesco; G.G., Giangiacomo; G.M., Genio Militare (Royal Engineers), Giammaria or Gran Maestro dell' Ordine; G.P., Giampietro or Giampaolo; V.G., Vostra grandezza or Verbi gratiâ; S.G., Sua Grazia; P.G., Padre generale; G., Giorno, Giovedì, or Genere.

In ancient Rome, as a number, G meant 400, or with a bar over it, 400,000.

On Prussian coins it indicates the mint at Stettin; on French, that of Poitiers, and on Swiss of Geneva.

G is hard as in English before a, o, u, soft before e, i, unless an h is interposed. Formerly g was uniformly soft unless followed by h; thus Agio was written Ago, and the present Ago was written Agho. It is silent before li (with a few exceptions, e.g. Negligere and words beginning Gli-) but softens the l, thus Togli is pronounced Tolyee. It is also silent before n and softens it, thus Sogno is pronounced So-nyo. An initial Gn takes Lo, Gli, Uno for the article, Lo gnomone, Lo gnorri.

Etym. unknown. Körting touches upon it in two different articles, as follows. Art. 6390 "Murreus, < murra, myrrh tree, seems to be the source of It. mogio, dispirited; Span. murrio, stupid in the head, > murria, heaviness in the head. As regards the transition in meaning it is to be observed that vinum murratum means wine of a bitter flavour doctored with myrrh, so that murreus could readily pass into the sense of 'drunk upon wine treated with myrrh, stupid, heavy in the head.' Diez does not suggest any origin for murrio." Art. 6408 "musimo -onem (μούσμων), a Sardinian animal, presumably the moufflon (Pliny 8. 199), though the word seems also to have meant an entire ass; this, according to Caix, is the original of It. miccio, ass, Lombard mŭssa, Friuli dial. muss. This however is a very unlikely theory; these words, together with many Italian adjectives, mostly dialectical, such as It. mogio, muso, Neapolitan muscio, matteo, Ferrarese moss etc., form a large group, going back to L. musteus, new, of the character of unfermented grape juice, viscid, cp. Schuchardt, Roman. ☞ In the Middle Ages time was reckoned by the Canonical Hours, v. Canonico, and an hour continued to be in Italian, as in Latin, the twelfth part of the time from sunrise to sunset, or from sunset to sunrise. But when clocks were invented it became the twenty-fourth part of the time from midnight to midnight and such expressions as Il tocco, = 1 p.m., Le dieci, = 10 a.m., then arose, so that, though La decima ora del giorno was from 3 to 4 p.m., Le dieci never meant anything but ten o'clock, and expressions like La decima ora del giorno dropped out of Italian as out of English. In the old system the complete day of twenty-four hours was considered to begin at sunset, and this mode of reckoning time still lingers in phrases such as Suonano le ventiquattro, the evening Ave Maria is being sung.

But the verb Paragonare answers to the Gr. παρακονάω, to rub against a whet-stone, ἀκόνη, and the meaning "to compare" springs very readily from that of testing. If both derivations are correct it is a curious instance of a word with two meanings so much akin and with origins so different. The Spanish derivation, however, is against history, since the word occurs in Italian at an earlier date than in Spanish, see Murray, New Engl. Dict., sub Paragon.
